

Census Provides Old News: We're Still Poor

This just in: We're still poor. Third poorest after Mississippi and, surprisingly, Arizona, according to the Census Bureau.

The latest statistics on poverty and the prickly public discussions of program cuts still haven't surfaced seriously in election campaigns. Some contenders for the Legislature get it, but economic realities are lost on the top of the ballot.

Last week we learned that the expected 21,000 new Medicaid recipients will bump the state's costs by $361 million, just as stimulus funding is petering out. And just as the downturn has also increased the number of people needing food stamps and other help.

Federal spending (Social Security, Medicaid, unemployment insurance, stimulus dollars) has been propping us up for some time. One of the more interesting facts reported recently by New Mexico Voices for Children is that between fiscal 2006 and fiscal 2011, federal support of the state's hospitals and health care as well as education rose significantly, which accommodated steady employment growth in both sectors.

Which makes me wonder how every Republican candidate I've heard lately can claim, "Government doesn't create jobs." They must also have stopped counting paychecks at the two national laboratories, three Air Force bases, White Sands Missile Range and 22 Indian reservations.

This is New Mexico. Government has been creating jobs here since farmers sold their first hay to Gen. Stephen Watts Kearney's occupying army in 1846.

But all good (or bad) things must end. Sen. Jeff Bingaman is warning that the stimulus spigot is turned off. "Congress has done about what it's going to do," he told the Albuquerque Journal in August. States, school districts and local governments shouldn't expect more.

Both candidates for governor have said they will tame the budget without laying a finger on education and Medicaid or raising taxes. To which current and former legislative budget watchdogs roll their eyes. Neither will be able to keep her campaign promises, predicted Max Coll, former chairman of the House Appropriations and Finance Committee.

"The budget deficit is a result of over-spending and mismanagement of the taxpayers' dollars," Republican Susana Martinez has said, without mentioning that the governor's personal income tax cuts account for a big chunk of this spending. She wants to sell the state's jet and slash appointed positions, but she'd need to sell 100 jets and banish 1,000 appointees before she made a dent in the looming deficit.

Democrat Diane Denish's proposed plan, discussed in previous columns, is more concrete but still comes up short. We're not likely to hear anything more honest from either. Politically, Martinez can't say she'd cut Medicaid, and Denish can't say she'd raise taxes. Of the two, Martinez is least prepared by experience or expertise for the kinds of decisions that lie ahead.

We're now getting a preview of things to come. After elementary schools in 22 school districts lost their school breakfast program, the nonprofit New Mexico Appleseed spoke up. Many kids who get a school breakfast didn't eat the night before; about a quarter of New Mexico's children don't know where their next meal will come from. Although studies show that kids who get a school breakfast perform and behave better than their unfed peers, you don't have to be a learned professor to know that hungry kids don't learn.

The breakfast program isn't a luxury, argued Appleseed's Jennifer Ramo. If anything, she said, it should be expanded. Last week the governor found enough change in the stimulus couch to restore the breakfast program. For now.

We might as well brace ourselves for a lot of these discussions. Faced with real needs of real people, political boilerplate and platitudes will be useless. Who do we choose to hurt?

* * *

The Martinez campaign said last week that I misquoted their candidate. For the record, she didn't say she would

Rio Grande Sun
Espanola, NM
Circ. 11507
From Page:
A7
10/7/2010
365122

All She Wrote
By Sherry
Robinson

place a moratorium on “all” regulations enacted in the last few years. She said she would look at placing a moratorium on “many” regulations enacted in the last two years. My objections are the same: Many regulations are necessary and even supported by those who are regulated. Martinez needs to be more specific.

© New Mexico News Services 2010

Rio Grande Sun
Española, NM
Circ. 11507
From Page:
A7
10/7/2010
365122

Economic reality missing in campaign promises

This just in: We're still poor. Third poorest after Mississippi and, surprisingly, Arizona, according to the Census Bureau.

The latest statistics on poverty and the prickly public discussions of program cuts still haven't surfaced seriously in election campaigns. Some contenders for the Legislature get it, but economic realities are lost on the top of the ballot.

Last week we learned that the expected 21,000 new Medicaid recipients will bump the state's costs by $361 million, just as stimulus funding is petering out. And just as the downturn has also increased the number of people needing food stamps and other help.

Federal spending (Social Security, Medicaid, unemployment insurance, stimulus dollars) has been propping us up for some time. One of the more interesting facts reported recently by New Mexico Voices for Children is that between fiscal 2006 and fiscal 2011, federal support of the state's hospitals and health care as well as education rose significantly, which accommodated steady employment growth in both sectors.

Which makes me wonder how every Republican candidate I've heard lately can claim, "Government doesn't create jobs." They must also have stopped counting paychecks at the two national laboratories, three Air Force bases, White Sands Missile Range and 22 Indian reservations.

This is New Mexico. Government has been creating jobs here since farmers sold their first hay to Gen. Stephen Watts Kearney's occupying army in 1846.

But all good (or bad) things must end. Sen. Jeff Bingaman is warning that the stimulus spigot is turned off. "Congress has done about what it's going to do," he told the Albuquerque Journal in August. States, school districts and local governments shouldn't expect more.

Both candidates for governor have said they will tame the budget without laying a finger on education and Medicaid or raising taxes. To which current and former legislative budget watchdogs roll their eyes. Neither will be able to keep her campaign promises, predicted Max Coll, former chairman of the House Appropriations and Finance Committee.

"The budget deficit is a result of overspending and mismanagement of the taxpayers' dollars," Republican Susana Martinez has said, without mentioning that the governor's personal income tax cuts account for a big chunk of this spending. She wants to sell the state's jet and slash appointed positions, but she'd need to sell 100 jets and banish 1,000 appointees before she made a dent in the looming deficit.

Democrat Diane Denish's proposed plan, discussed in previous columns, is more concrete but still comes up short. We're not likely to hear anything more honest from either. Politically, Martinez can't say she'd cut Medicaid, and Denish can't say she'd raise taxes. Of the two, Martinez is least prepared by experience or expertise for the kinds of decisions that lie ahead.

We're now getting a preview of things to come. After elementary schools in 22 school districts lost their school breakfast program, the nonprofit New Mexico Appleseed spoke up. Many kids who get a school breakfast didn't eat the night before; about a quarter of New Mexico's children don't know where their next meal will come from. Although studies show that kids who get a school breakfast perform and behave better than their unfed peers, you don't have to be a learned professor to know that hungry kids don't learn.

The breakfast program isn't a luxury, argued Appleseed's Jennifer Ramo. If anything, she said, it should be expanded. Last week the governor found enough change in the stimulus couch to restore the breakfast program. For now.

We might as well brace ourselves for a lot of these discussions. Faced with real needs of real people, political boilerplate and platitudes will be useless. Who do we choose to hurt?

* * *

The Martinez campaign said last week that I misquoted their candidate. For the record, she didn't say she would place a moratorium on "all" regulations enacted in the last few years. She said she would look at placing a moratorium on "many" regulations enacted in the last two years. My objections are the same: Many regulations are necessary and even supported by those who are regulated. Martinez needs to be more specific.

© New Mexico News Services 2010

Roswell Daily Record
Roswell, NM
Circ. 11745
From Page:
a4
10/5/2010
361682

Artesia Daily
Press
Artesia, NM
Circ. 3900
From Page:
a6
10/3/2010
361117

Economic reality missing in campaigns

This just in: We're still poor. Third poorest after Mississippi and, surprisingly, Arizona, according to the Census Bureau.

The latest statistics on poverty and the prickly public discussions of program cuts still haven't surfaced seriously in election campaigns. Some contenders for the Legislature get it, but economic realities are lost on the top of the ballot.

Last week we learned that the expected 21,000 new Medicaid recipients will bump the state's costs by $361 million, just as stimulus funding is petering out. And just as the downturn has also increased the number of people needing food stamps and other help.

Federal spending (Social Security, Medicaid, unemployment insurance, stimulus dollars) has been propping us up for some time. One of the more interesting facts reported recently by New Mexico Voices for Children is that between fiscal 2006 and fiscal 2011, federal support of the state's hospitals and health care as well as education rose significantly, which accommodated steady employment growth in both sectors.

Which makes me wonder how every Republican candidate I've heard lately can claim. "Government doesn't create jobs." They must also have stopped counting paychecks at the two national laboratories, three Air Force bases, White Sands Missile Range and 22 Indian reservations.

This is New Mexico. Government has been creating jobs here since farmers sold their first hay to Gen. Stephen Watts Kearney's occupying army in 1846.

But all good (or bad) things must end. Sen. Jeff Bingaman is warning that the stimulus spigot is turned off. "Congress has done about what it's going to do," he told the Albuquerque Journal in August. States, school districts and local governments shouldn't expect more.

Both candidates for governor have said they will tame the budget without laying a finger on education and Medicaid or raising taxes. To which current and former legislative budget watchdogs roll their eyes. Neither will be able to keep her campaign promises, predicted Max Coll, former chairman of the House Appropriations and Finance Committee.

"The budget deficit is a result of overspending and mismanagement of the taxpayers' dollars," Republican Susana Martinez has said, without mentioning that the governor's personal income tax cuts account for a big chunk of this spending. She wants to sell the state's jet and slash appointed positions, but she'd need to sell 100 jets and banish 1,000 appointees before she made a dent in the looming deficit.

Democrat Diane Denish's proposed plan, discussed in previous columns, is more concrete but still comes up short. We're not likely to hear anything more honest from either. Politically, Martinez can't say she'd cut Medicaid, and Denish can't say she'd raise taxes. Of the two, Martinez is least prepared by experience or expertise for the kinds of decisions that lie ahead.

We're now getting a preview of things to come. After elementary schools in 22 school districts lost their school breakfast program, the non-profit New Mexico Appleseed spoke up. Many kids who get a school breakfast didn't eat the night before; about a quarter of New Mexico's children don't know where their next meal will come from. Although studies show that kids who get a school breakfast perform and behave better than their unfed peers, you don't have to be a learned professor to know that hungry kids don't learn.

The breakfast program isn't a luxury, argued Appleseed's Jennifer Ramo. If anything, she said, it should be expanded. Last week the governor found enough change in the stimulus couch to restore the breakfast program. For now.

We might as well brace ourselves for a lot of these discussions. Faced with real needs of real people, political boilerplate and platitudes will be useless. Who do we choose to hurt?

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Sherry Robinson's column is distributed by New Mexico News Services.)