

Business writer honored with UNM alumnus award

Journal Staff Report

Journal staff writer Winthrop Quigley has been named this year's University of New Mexico economics department distinguished alumnus.

Quigley received his bachelor's degree in 1980 and his master's degree in business, also from UNM, in 1982. The department cited his articles and commentary that attempt to explain economic issues to the general public.

The department began honoring its alumni in 1989, UNM's centennial year, to recognize their contributions to the state's economy and to public understanding of economics. Among past winners are Arthur A. Blumenfeld, who taught public administration at UNM and held many administrative posts in Albuquerque city government; Gerry Bradley, a policy director with New Mexico Voices for Children; bank executive William G. "Bing" Grady; attorney Wendy E. York; and economics professors Larry Waldman and David Brookshire.

Quigley has covered economics and business news for the Albuquerque Journal since 2000. He was a general assignments reporter and editorial writer with the Journal from 1974 to 1979. Between his Journal stints, Quigley worked as a product and investment manager for several technology companies.
